Mata Ortiz is a small town in Mexico that is known for its reinterpretation of Casas Grandes ceramics, a pre-Columbian pueblo and artistry that is attributed to the Mogollon culture. Juan Quezada and his family are known to have brought this ceramic artform back to prominence in the 1970s and have been making and exhibiting the artform and hosting workshops since the early 1980s. Their work has been covered in various books, doctoral theses, and periodicals and can be found in major museums in the United States, Europe, and Japan.
